▶▶▶ How do job service providers work?

Many Centrelink payments have an eligibility requirement - that you look for work, study or volunteer for a certain amount of hours per week. Employment service providers are agencies providing various kinds of support for people looking for work. Providers separate clients into different streams depending on the assessed difficulty they think you may face in finding work.

All clients are entitled to:

- assistance preparing a resume,
- advice on the best ways to look for work,
- details of job opportunities in your area (including available jobs suited to you),
- information on how you can receive training to skill you for work opportunities,
- access to an interpreter and
- ongoing access to Jobsearch and computer facilities.

The level of assistance available will depend on which stream you are in. Dependent on this, job service providers may also be able to provide you with counselling and other professional support, referral and help accessing other support services and even practical assistance for example; financial assistance with public transport fares, purchasing an outfit for job interviews.

You can either enrol yourself with a Jobsearch provider or be referred by Centrelink. Choose your service provider carefully as it can be difficult to change later.

NOTE: You must have an assessment before you can access disability services. Contact the agency or Centrelink so you can bring the required paperwork to your appointment.
